Man's eye might pierce the deep, All life seemed dead, the air like lead, And Death himself asleep! So it was all the weary day, But ere came down the dark,

A seaman's cry was heard on high, "He comes—the demon shark!" From out the twilight bottom We saw the monster rise. A living grave amid the wave, A grave with hellish eyes!

He came to gape for corses; For in his caverns dim, Fierce Fever's voice he heard rejoice. And bid a feast for him. So one by one in hammocks. With shot to sink them low, A prayer was said above the dead,

And then we let them go ! Down went the corses one by one. Down, down into the dark. And after them more fierce than death,

Sank down the demon shark. Our hearts were filled with hatred, For ere the sun had set,

Saw we that Shark again.
